Now all this must have taken up some considerable time. Even if Indutiomarus began his preparations before Caesar and his legions actually appeared on the scene, yet the defection of the chiefs, Indutiomarus offer to submit, the settlement of the list of hostages, their collection and appearance in the camp, and lastly, the meeting of the chiefs to make peace with Indutiomarus individually, must have extended over a period of several days after Caesars arrival, and could certainly not have been concluded in less than three days after that event. 4. Peace being established among the Treviri, Caesar marched his army to Boulogne (6), a distance of at least 240 miles, which occupied sixteen days on the former calculation, that the army could march 15 miles a day continuously. 5. On his arrival at Boulogne he found that 40 ships which had been built among the Meldi had been driven back by a storm; but that all the rest of the fleet were there in readiness to sail, and had been fitted with every requisite according to his orders. He thereupon moved the whole of the Gallic cavalry, 4000 in number, to the port, and everything was ready for the contemplated expedition (c). SECTION XXXIV.--Preparations for the Second Voyage. 1. A pretty accurate idea of the form of the new vessels may be obtained from the following considerations. The length of a horse, exclusive of his head and neck, is about 6 feet. Two, therefore, placed tail to tail in the centre of a vessel with their heads towards the sides, would require a space of 12 feet. Another 3 feet on each side would be required for the rowers, who might s...
