

Online Training

This is the first book to offer realistic and practical advice about the new field of on-line training. It looks in detail at the essential background to setting up training, but with a special relevance to doing so on the internet, where the constraints and technologies are very different from the classroom or lecture hall. Starting with an overview of the technology, the book covers major elements such as setting objectives and learning outcomes, preparing a project plan and designing online activities. This is where the book really takes off in new directions as the authors wide experience in internet and computing techniques are brought to bear on the fascinating business of using the available techniques and technologies to create interesting and viable learning experiences. The interactive aspects of the internet are explored and tips are given to assist with facilitating the training when it is up and running. A most enjoyable and challenging book, full of useable ideas and techniques.
