Not illustrated. 1836 Excerpt: ... entreaties were in vain. He seemed to have no feeling whatever with respect to the unfortunate animals, except to urge them on as far as he could within the shortest possible space of time. I insisted, however, upon justice being done to them, and dismounting at the first house, looking like an inn, which I met on the road, I refused to go further until the horses were provided with corn. He observed that, if the horses were to dine there, so also must I; a proceeding, however, (o which I objected, as we were not then more than two or three leagues distant from Karnabat, a town of some importance in Romania. However, he gave orders for dinner. An unhappy hen, who was amusing herself sauntering about the farm-yard, was laid hold of by our landlady, who, having gashed the jugular vein with skill, dipped the body into boiling water, plucked off the feathers, and in about an hour presented the victim to me boiled to rags, in a wooden bowl, which looked so filthy that nothing could induce me to touch its contents. A wooden tray was also brought, with coarse dirty salt, halfbaked black bread, and a rusty knife. I resolutely deferred dining until we should stop for the night at the town already mentioned. The Tartar took his usual meal of bread, hard eggs, and onions; and when he saw that I would scarcely even look at the fowl, he deliberately wrapped it up in some paper, and put it into the havresack, which dangled from his saddle KARNABAT.-- a very useless precaution, though I, for if you do not eat it yourself, I am quite sure that nobody else will! We remounted about seven oclock in the evening. Our horses at first got on very well; but after exerting themselves for an hour or two, it became
